COP26 is Coming! How Project Managers Influence Sustainable Development

APM webinar held on 4 May 2021. Organised by the APM Midlands Branch Presenter: Rob Leslie-Carter With COP26 looming ever closer, the project management profession needs to accelerate developing our knowledge and skills to align our operations with our ambitions. Arup Director Rob Leslie-Carter joined us to discuss the route to achieving net zero through programmes and projects, and how every project manager can influence sustainable development. Rob has very kindly allowed his presented material to be made available for viewing. The slides on Slideshare and the webinar recording on YouTube is now available in our APM resources area and also embedded below for reference. Questions raised during the recording will be reviewed and published with the speaker responses in the near future. Useful links:

Responsible project management

APM Webinar presented by Dr Karen Thompson and Dr Nigel Williams on 12 May 2020. Hosted by the Wessex Branch. Projects impact society and the environment. Project managers increasingly have a responsibility to reduce harm, restore natural and social resources and to maximise the benefits to society of their projects. Responsible Project Management is a new concept that is emerging from collaboration between researchers and practitioners. Responsible Project Management aims to develop new competencies and support project managers in advocating for beneficial project outcomes. This was originally planned as a branch event and was taken online in response to the COVID-19 crisis. This turned out to be highly beneficial, because 448 members registered for the event, and there were well over 300 attendees from across the UK and abroad who engaged with the event in real time. The event was equally suitable for novice and experienced project managers, apprentices and students of project management. Responsible Project Management events are usually highly interactive because development of this new concept has been, and continues to be, an on-going journey of social learning, involving a wide range of project practitioners. Our usual approach was adapted for the large online audience to include polls that captured audience beliefs and assumptions about project management. We began by exploring the emerging concept of Responsible Project Management, the work done to date and identified some practical actions that project managers can take. We then shared our current road map of activities and invited attendees to join the various work groups. Activities include a collaboration with the UK Major Projects Knowledge Hub to provide virtual internships, developing a new syllabus to introduce social and environmental responsibilities early in project management education, and plans to declare 2021 as the International Year of Responsible Project Management: the year project management comes of age.
